Another new record has been set in an already record-bursting primary season in 2018. According to data from the Center for American Women and Politics (CAWP), a division of the Eagleton Institute of Politics at Rutgers University, more women of color have won nominations for U.S. House than in any other year.

This year, 80 women of color have secured nominations in U.S. House races. The previous record, set in 2016, was 55. In addition, both the Democratic and Republican parties have bested their respective records. In 2018, the Democrats nominated 65 women of color, topping their previous record of 42, set in 2016. The previous high-water mark for Republicans, also set in 2016, was 13, and in 2018 they've pushed that number to 15.

In terms of proportions, women of color this year make up 34.2% of all women nominees, 35.7% of Democratic women nominees, and 28.8% of Republican women nominees. A complete breakdown of women candidates by racial and ethnic identity, as well as other data from 2018, can be viewed in chart form at CAWP’s post-primary summary page, By the Numbers: Women Congressional Candidates in 2018.

About CAWP

The Center for American Women and Politics (CAWP), a unit of the Eagleton Institute of Politics at Rutgers-New Brunswick, is nationally recognized as the leading source of scholarly research and current data about American women's political participation. Its mission is to promote greater knowledge and understanding about women's participation in politics and government and to enhance women's influence and leadership in public life. CAWP's education and outreach programs translate research findings into action, addressing women's under-representation in political leadership with effective, imaginative programs serving a variety of audiences. As the world has watched Americans considering female candidates for the nation's highest offices, CAWP's over four decades of analyzing and interpreting women's participation in American politics have provided a foundation and context for the discussion.
